HUMINT collection was a key element in helping thwart attacks and bombings during the 'Troubles' in Northern Ireland

EYE SPY WEB EDITORIAL

FROM THE EDITOR - MARK BIRDSALL

A decade ago we composed a tradecraft series which focused on development of the improvised explosive device or IED for short. I learned a great deal from two 'operatives' who were adversaries in the so-called Troubles in Northern Ireland. One was engaged in bomb building, the other charged to stop such happenings. What surprised me was the cunning used to construct menacing and destructive objects from ordinary devices. In the 1970s these essentially mechanical bombs were detonated in various ways; from timers using simple items such as candles, to more sophisticated bombs reliant on dissolving acids. And of course, there was the well tried and tested cable wire and push variants. By the early 1980s the bombmakers were adapting new emerging technologies.

One IED the IRA used utilised an electronic unit used to open a door. Its simplicity and size made it difficult to detect and counter. I was later asked to modify the feature and understood why.

Fast forward a decade, the types of IEDs currently being built are reflective of an ever-changing world that is totally reliant on technology and 'chips'. And they have a 'trigger' friend which has replaced the cable and candle - the cell phone. No longer does a bomber need to be present or in the immediate vicinity to detonate a device - they simply require a signal. Little surprise therefore that at the gates of many sensitive areas, security details have the technology at hand to jam cell phone signals.

But what of the here and now and immediate future? One major concern is the increasing use of suicide bombers by terror groups around the world. Combine this with adapted technology and explosives, the security services (in all environments) have a problem.

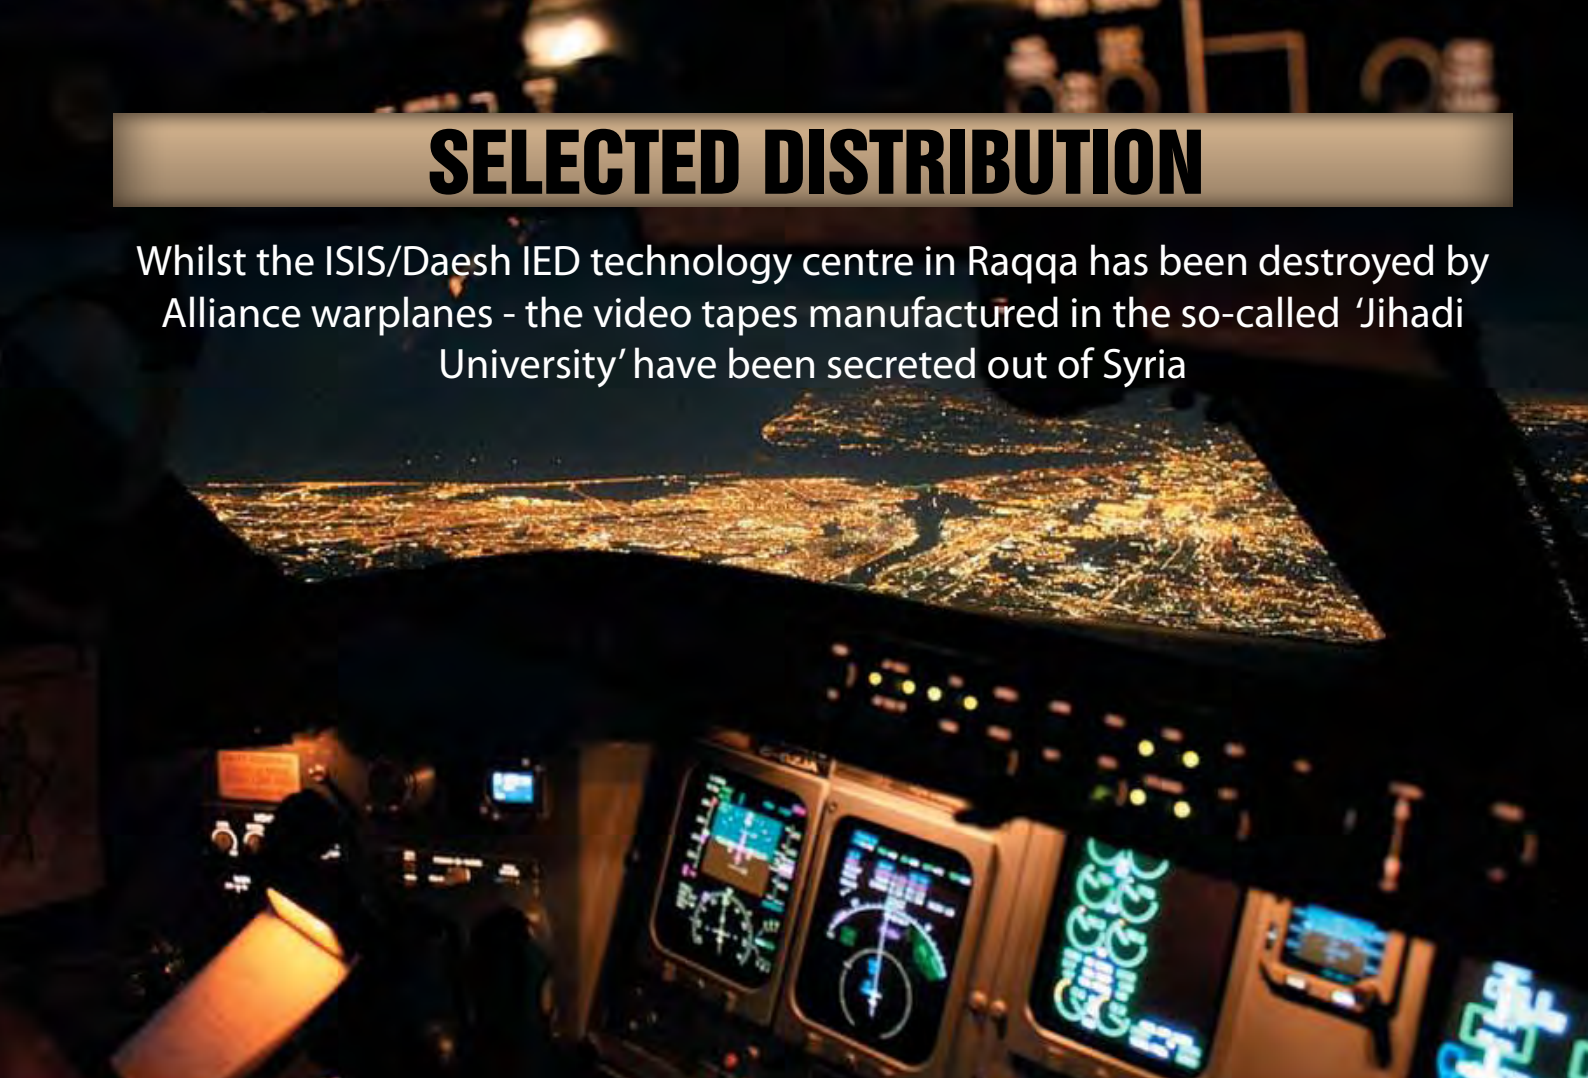

In this edition of Eye Spy we look at how ISIS/Daesh bombmakers are trying to outflank the intelligence world. There exists around eight hours of disturbing raw film footage which was found on the person of an ISIS terrorist trying to reach Europe. The material was never intended to be uploaded to the Internet for global consumption, but for a selected number of people who could utilise the product. The ISIS hierarchy in the Raqqa factory where the film was shot hoped the bombers would carry out attacks in their own countries.

SELECTED DISTRIBUTION

Whilst the ISIS/Daesh IED technology centre in Raqqa has been destroyed by Alliance warplanes - the video tapes manufactured in the so-called 'Jihadi University' have been secreted out of Syria

Amongst the video footage there is sufficient information to suggest the terror group has the means to bring down airliners. Not just by secreting bombs on board via operatives working at an airport food supply company; a customs official who momentarily chooses to focus elsewhere or a baggage handler who inserts an extra 'item' in the luggage. ISIS has managed to customise and alter the internal mechanism of an air-to-air missile which can be fired from the surface (SAM). And after over-running many of Syria's airbases in the past three years, the group is hardly short of a missile or two. It was one reason an ISIS cell in the Sinai Desert claimed the terror group had shot down Metrojet 9268 in November 2015. Of course it was a bomb - but the group on the ground did not know this - but they were knowledgeable about the covert SAM work.

Another recent event which occurred in the first week of February is evidence of the IED-technology offensive. Here a passenger was blown out of a Daallo airliner after a device was smuggled on board an Airbus A321 at Mogadishu Airport in Somalia. Investigators are still probing the event, but it seems likely the bomb had been secreted in a laptop computer - or even a wheelchair.

Stopping ISIS/Daesh operatives before they engage in terrorism is now a priority: it is being discussed at every level of government in most advanced nations. Some of the countermeasures already introduced are explored in the edition. However, I fear a number, including the reintroduction of border control checks, may be too late. Undoubtedly hundreds of characters have slipped into Europe (and elsewhere) with genuine refugees who have fled the wars which have engulfed massive regions in Syria and Iraq.

Just as worrying are the growing number of ISIS followers who have never visited the Syrian/Iraq theatre but describe themselves as 'foot soldiers'. The damage such people can cause was evidenced in the quiet Californian town of San Bernardino in early December - just as our 100th edition went to press. San Bernardino residents Tashfeen Malik and her husband Syed Farook, calmly, and for no apparent reason, despatched 14 people - some colleagues and friends. When this happened ISIS celebrated and called for similar 'adventures'.

One intelligence element that is increasingly important to the security services in this respect is HUMINT (human intelligence).

Eye Spy 101 sees the start of a two-part tradecraft feature which explores HUMINT uses and its fragilities.

Predicting 'horizon threats' are the lifeblood of analysts who work in this specialist field, thus I'm happy to report we have a splendid overview carefully constructed using the thoughts, contacts and data from our Editorial team. Not to be missed!

On a much lighter note, on 8 February NSA Director Admiral Michael Rogers met with his GCHQ counterpart Robert Hannigan at the former home of Britain's codebreakers - Bletchley Park. Delegates celebrated the 75th anniversary of the UK-USA special relationship which began after the arrival of a handful of US signals specialists in 1941.

Bletchley Park is of course situated in the county of Buckinghamshire, appropriate therefore that Eye Spy 101 carries a fascinating feature on the many interesting spies and intelligence people who have connections to the area.

Enjoy this brief overview and thank you for your continued support in 2016.

MOSCOW'S DARK AGENTS

It was the most predictable verdict heard in a London court for years - two Russian intelligence officers played a central role in the assassination of former FSB officer and MI6 agent, Lt. Colonel Alexander Litvinenko, 43, in November 2006 and President Putin and his most senior spy chief probably knew it was going to happen.

OPERATION ANARCHIST Eyes of Others

More Snowden Leaks Aimed at Damaging UK-US-Israeli Liaison

NSA contractor Edward Snowden who stole over 500,000 classified documents has released a new series of surveillance papers showing more evidence for the agency and GCHQ in the evidence they are particularly sensitive as they suggest the primary target was Israel. Extreme danger and the control eventually drove between USA and UK were concerned about some aspects of Israel's threat towards the high-level, particularly open, the waters and the fact that Israel would launch a pre-emptive strike on Israel's nuclear sites.

The article, which was the result of the surveillance was performed was 'Operation Anarchist'. It was the first of a series of leaks that were aimed at damaging the UK-US-Israeli Liaison.

Edward Snowden

Intercepted all manner of low-level and suggested receiving from Israel (including the armed forces, TF and Hamas, plus internal weapons flights. How long the operation was to last is a matter of debate with some sources claiming it all began in 2005. When it started is also debated, but it was the result of a 2005 US report on the situation in the region.

The reason the UK has been described as a 'target' in the context, due to the nature of the operation was to launch a pre-emptive strike on Israel's nuclear sites.
